ABSTRACT

Noting that many kids' and teens' magazines are not available at newsstands or bookstores, this book describes and provides ordering information for more than 200 such magazines. The magazines described cover almost every conceivable interest of children and teens in the United States and in many other countries. After a foreword by Jim Trelease and "how-to-use" guide by the editor, the book presents an alphabetical listing of the magazines. Each entry in the book contains an annotation citing the journal's coverage; ordering information; read; intended audience (sex and age); subject; circulation size; manner of distribution (subscriptions, newsstands, schools, libraries, churches); editor's and publisher's names; and whether readers' works are published. Contains an age index, a subject index, a list of magazines publishing readers' work, an alphabetical list of magazines for kids, and an alphabetical list of magazines for teens. (RS)

Foreword by Jim Trelease

A few years ago while waiting in line at an airport newsstand, I spied an old friend. At least I thought it was an old friend. Indeed, I hadn't seen the friend in more than 40 years and therefore thought I might be mistaken. So I stepped out of line to get a better look. And the closer look proved it was the "old friend" I hadn't seen since I was seven years old.

To be more exact, the old friend was a copy of The Babe Ruth Story, the one my father had read to me each week when it was serialized in the pages of The Saturday Evening Post in February and March of 1948. Holding it in the airport I assumed the book had been reissued in conjunction with the release of actor John Goodman's film, The Babe.

One might ask, "How did I know for certain that this was the book my father had read to me?" I looked for the ghostwriter's name. You see, the Babe's power at the plate was not matched by his prowess at the tablet or typewriter, and thus he needed a ghostwriter to put his life into words. And each week, when my father hauled me atop his lap and turned to the next installment of the series, he would begin the reading with the same words: "The Babe Ruth Story, by Babe Ruth, as told to Bob Considine." And it was Considine's name I searched for that morning in the airport, the name that identified it as the exact one my father had read to me.

Why would someone remember the name of a ghostwriter of an article that had been read to him more than 40 years earlier? David Kherdian, the writer and poet, once explained it this way: "What we learn in childhood is carved in stone; what we learn in adulthood is carved in ice." The names of people I met last week or last night usually melt within hours or minutes. But what I learned as a child—the name of the street we tobogganed on, the man who owned the delicatessen, my grandmother's telephone number—those are carved in stone and last the ages.

Although both of my parents were literate people, neither ever attended college; indeed, my mother left school as a stenographer after tenth grade. Books and library cards were part of our home but not as much as magazines. There was just enough money for the necessities—the bus fare for Dad and the rent for our two-bedroom apartment in Union, New Jersey. For a long time, there was no car, no television; just three boys, then four, in a single bedroom. But somehow there was always enough money for magazines—perhaps because they were seen as necessities—maybe because they were (and still are) less expensive than books.

And it was magazines (and the daily newspaper) that made the biggest impact on my literacy, far more than any textbook in school. To begin with, I saw my parents reading magazines. Since the apple doesn't fall far from the tree, role modeling is very important here. When my father read to me, each reading was a lesson—though we didn't know it at the time.

He'd hold the cover of The Post in front of us and ask me what I thought the artist was trying to say. After we'd discussed it, he'd turn to the last page of the magazine and we'd read

"Hazel," the cartoon panel that years later would become the TV series with Shirley Booth. Humor is a very complicated thought process. In order to understand humor, one must be able to juggle two thoughts at the same time and simultaneously make a comparison of the two. You must picture in your mind: (1) the way things are in the joke; (2) the way things should be; and (3) compare the two in order to see the humorous contrast. That was the mental exercise my father and I went through with each "Hazel."

And then he would read me one of the stories from the magazine, explaining or paraphrasing (even editing out) what I didn't or shouldn't understand. The ideal thing would have been for him to share a children's magazine with me, but such entities were few and far between back in the 1940s. Today, as Magazines for Kids and Teens attests, there is no such shortage. The abundance of choices for magazines in all age groups requires a guide like this one to direct parents and educators through the plethora of publications.

Gradually something began to grow in our family. Because we saw our parents with magazines and because they'd been made available and appealing to us (through reading aloud), we became attracted to them. Their flexibility (as opposed to hard-bound books) and the brevity of their stories were also appealing. And I don't think the four Trelease brothers were any different from other teenagers when we made the "forbidden fruit" association with magazines; that is, since our teachers never assigned magazines to be read, we thought there was something verboten about them—thus they became even more attractive.

What we didn't know was that each night when we crawled into bed with our pile of magazines, we were going to school. Yes, my brother Brian's junior high English teachers might have been pulling their hair out over his unfinished worksheets, but what they didn't realize was that he was going to "night school"—lying in bed reading the likes of John Steinbeck, William Faulkner, and J.P. Marquand, whose works were being excerpted in the pages of Sports Illustrated in those days. He didn't know who those guys were; he just knew they were writing about sports and that's what he liked. (The greatest learning takes place at the point of interest.) And the more Brian read, the better he got at it, gradually moving out of the remedial group, through the D's, and eventually to college and a master's degree.

What many educators now have begun to realize is that reading is reading, whether you're using a textbook, a cookbook, a comic book, a newspaper, or a magazine. The only way to get better at it is by doing it. How do we get children to read more? By tying the act to their interests. With the variety now available in publishing and with guides like this one in your hand, that's the easy part—connecting a music fan, a gymnast, a computer whiz, or a Scout to the appropriate magazine.

Real literacy is more caught than taught. Most of the time we're unaware the catching is taking place. The same rules for grammar, spelling, and punctuation exist in magazines as in textbooks. The difference usually is that magazines you enjoy reading, textbooks you endure reading. But as the parade of words and sentences fly by your eyes and make minuscule connections throughout your brain, you are observing and absorbing how and when to use a certain word or punctuation. Call it "copy-cat learning."

Because reading is really the mental absorption of writing, we often end up writing the way we read. One example is Tony Hillerman, the popular adult mystery writer of the American southwest. Hillerman grew up in Oklahoma, a third-generation German American, and attended an American Indian boarding school for farm children. After receiving a journalism degree from the University of Oklahoma, he worked for years as a wire service reporter and then as an editor with The Santa Fe New Mexican. With that varied background, whom did he imitate when he became a novelist? Hillerman once wrote, "When my first book (The Blessing Way) was published, a reviewer said it was reminiscent of the Australian writer Arthur Upfield. I looked at that and said, 'Aw, yeah! I betcha.' So I went to the library and found some Upfield, and sure enough."

The Upfield connection had been established when Hillerman was a young boy, peddling The Saturday Evening Post—which often serialized the Australian's novels about an aborigine detective. Before delivering the copies, Hillerman would read (and absorb) each issue. In retrospect, Hillerman says, "I went through all my life with these incredible memories from that serial, of the Australian outback and the aboriginal culture. I just loved it."

I know just how Hillerman felt when he discovered the connection—kind of like finding an old friend in the newsstand at the airport. Those magazine connections are carved in stone and carved with pleasure.

How to Use Magazines for Kids and Teens by Donald R. Stoll

If you are like most people, you probably picked up Magazines for Kids and Teens and flipped through it just like you would a magazine. Good! That's the way we designed it.

First, you probably looked for listings of familiar publications. Then you scanned the other listings, looking for a title that interested you, and maybe you discovered how the listings are arranged. Finally, you looked at the front of the book, and you found this page, which is provocatively titled with a big, bold "How to...." Researchers tell us these are the two strongest words in a magazine headline.

You follow this procedure because you are "magazine literate." You have learned how to quickly figure out how a publication works—how it's organized, where to find information, and how to gauge whether it fits into your life and interests. But magazine literacy also involves knowing how to get the most from a magazine.

Magazines for Kids and Teens provides a tool to help you, your students, your children or your teens, and anyone else for whom the reading habit is important, develop and refine magazine literacy. But first some background.

There are tens of thousands of magazines and periodicals published around the world, and all of them are unique in some way. Obviously, magazines vary in subject matter and approach, but even magazines that focus on the same subject and have the same reader profile differ from each other. Magazines reflect different personalities that make one magazine appealing and another very similar magazine not as appealing. Readers need to see whether or not they like different magazines by sampling many different types to see if they are a good "fit" with the reader.

Because many young readers have difficulty knowing what they like and most children's magazines and many teen magazines are not widely available on newsstands, finding the right fit can be tricky. The solution is to gather samples of magazines appropriate to the age and interests of the young reader and allow opportunities for browsing. Here are some suggestions for creating a browsing collection without breaking the bank:

- Search through the indexes at the end of Magazines for Kids and Teens. One lists magazines by age/grade, another by subject. Identify 15 to 20 magazines that might interest your young reader.
- Look up the magazine in Magazines for Kids and Teens. Read the listing and determine whether your selections are suitable and whether they are likely to be available locally for purchase.
- Note which magazines are favored in waiting rooms and in the homes of friends. Ask others with young readers of similar reading levels and interests which magazines are popular. Look up these in Magazines for Kids and Teens as well.

- If your choices are available on newsstands, purchase a copy. If not, scan the collections at local and school libraries. Encourage your young reader to look at a minimum of four or five magazines.
- Most magazines listed in this book indicate how to obtain a sample copy. Some publishers charge a fee, but many do not. Most are willing to incur the expense of sending samples to potential subscribers because they know this is an excellent way to generate those subscriptions.
- Create your own library from these samples. Give your young readers a month or two to pick which two, three, four or more magazines you should order. You can pass the unwanted magazines on to friends, relatives, librarians, and teachers.
- Order the magazines in your child's name. Few things bring bigger smiles to young readers than getting something addressed to them in the mail!
- When his or her subscription starts, work with your young reader to master the basics of magazine literacy such as using a table of contents and identifying the difference between editorial and advertising copy.

Reading and enjoying magazines can help your young reader develop a lifelong reading habit, one of life's most valuable assets.

How Children and Teens Can Publish Their Writing

Some young readers are not content to simply develop magazine literacy. They want to create the experiences that the writing of others has created for them; they want to write and have their writing published.

Editors and publishers of children's and teens' magazines recognize and value this impulse. Many offer a wide range of opportunities for young writers to have their work published. These opportunities range from publications that consist solely of young writers' work such as Merlyn's Pen, New Moon, and Stone Soup, to those publishing an occasional reader-generated article, story, poem, advice column, or editorial, to those publishing only readers' letters and drawings.

Although few publications pay for reader-created material, the thrill a young writer or artist feels when seeing his or her name in print is great indeed. Magazines for Kids and Teens can help the hopeful young contributor reach this goal. Here are some suggestions.

- Listings in Magazines for Kids and Teens include a notation entitled "Readers' Work Published." Those magazines that do accept readers' work are listed in a separate index.
- All potential young contributors must realize that magazines publish work that is of value to the magazine's readership. The secret is to submit good work within the magazine's guidelines.
- To determine whether work is likely to be accepted, look through your browsing copies to see what type of writing those magazines publish. To expand your sample library, follow the procedure outlined earlier.
- Editors will tell potential contributors that the best way to know what the magazine wants is to look at the content of the magazine. Are the letters, poems, and drawings tied to the theme of the issue? Are the letters long or short? What kinds of jokes do the editors think their readers will enjoy?

- Many magazines use writer's guidelines to tell potential contributors what they are looking for. These may be requested directly from the editor.
- Don't get discouraged. It is never the contributor who is rejected, it is the contribution. Each new piece of work is a new opportunity. Try other publications as well.
- Use Magazines for Kids and Teens to discover new outlets for contributions. Many of the publications accept contributors' work. Those with small circulations or with limited geographical distribution may not get as many contributions as larger, more established magazines, and these could be good magazines to try.

The excitement of sending a letter to the editor or sending a drawing to a magazine and the encouragement that comes with having that contribution published ranks with the best of all experiences young creators can have. Although most contributions are not used, and very few magazines return submissions or personally acknowledge all submissions whether they are used or not, some are published. Tailoring the submission to the publication makes a significant difference.

Acknowledgments

Thanks...

Magazines for Kids and Teens grew from the fertile mind of Kent Brown, editor of Highlights for Children, during his tenure as EdPress president. It was nurtured by Jennifer Stevenson, former director of publications at the International Reading Association and also a former president of EdPress. Nourishment continues to be provided by Joan Irwin, IRA director of publications, her talented staff, particularly Wendy Russ and Janet Parrack, and the EdPress staff, particularly Alana Peterson and David Dilks. And, my thanks to Jim Trelease for his inspiring foreword.

Julie Mercier, former managing director of EdPress, made the book happen. She found the new kids on the block, kept in contact with the establishment, chronicled the changes in ownership and personnel, and bid reluctant good-byes to those magazines who closed their doors since 1994. The original book design belongs to her.

As always, grateful thanks go to the EdPress executive board and to my family, Pat and Genevieve, who provided encouragement, help, support, and an occasional icepop.

Two other acknowledgments—one to the people behind the magazines that go to kids and teens—the editors, the writers, the art directors, the artists and illustrators, the marketing people, the researchers, the publishers, and everyone else who gives of themselves to make the magazines. Thank you for doing what you do.

The second acknowledgment goes to the parents, the teachers, the librarians, the reading specialists, the uncles, aunts, and grandparents—everyone who brings young readers to the wonders of these magazines. Keep up the good work and spread the word.

is the magazine for very tots. Every month in Popi, they find a new story about Lou and his monkey Popi, and meet their old friend the Little Brown Bear (who's also on television). With a little surprise in the middle, photos of Popi the monkey and the picture circle, they take their first steps in learning. A real helping hand in the educational awakening of its "little readers," Popi helps guide them from the first words to their first conversations.

Index to Magazines for Kids and Teens

These indexes are designed to help you identify publications that meet specific age ranges and interests.

Magazines listed in the guide are arranged alphabetically by title. They are divided into four age groups: ages 0 to 6 years, ages 6 to 11 years, ages 8 to 14 years, and ages 14 years and up, roughly corresponding to reading level. Many magazines are suitable for readers of a wider range of reading levels and have been listed in several age groups.

The second index identifies 36 areas of interest and lists magazines addressing them. Again, many publications cross over interest lines and are listed in several categories.

Magazines that accept readers' work are grouped as those publishing readers' work (1) exclusively, (2) regularly, and (3) occasionally.

The last index lists alphabetically the kids' magazines followed by the teens' magazines.

How do we get children to read more? By tying the act to their interests. With the variety now available in publishing and with guides like Magazines for Kids and Teens, that's the easy part—connecting a music fan, a gymnast, a computer whiz, or a Scout to the appropriate magazine.
—Jim Trelease, author of the bestseller, The Read-Aloud Handbook, from the Foreword

Parents, teachers, and librarians know that magazines for young people

- make learning fun
- encourage kids and teens to read and write
- are tailored to specific interests
- publish kids' and teens' creative efforts
- are affordable and make excellent gifts

Many kids' and teens' magazines are not available at newsstands or bookstores, so interested parents, teachers, and librarians often don't know the wide variety of magazines that are published for young people. Magazines for Kids and Teens solves that problem.

Inside are more than 200 listings to choose from—complete with descriptions and ordering information—covering almost every conceivable interest of children and teens in the United States and in many other countries.

A useful How-to-Use guide by the editor, Donald Stoll, is included to assist you in selecting magazines to explore. Indexes of age levels and subjects and a list of magazines that publish readers' works will also help you connect young readers to the appropriate magazines.
